Raman asked his mother after school if he could go home and play with Jack. She said "Yes", and she would come and fetch him at half-past five. She wore a long, flowing sari, and Jack thought she was very beautiful. "She's an Indian princess," he thought. "I'll ride to her rescue if she's in danger."

When they reached Jack's house, Jack took Raman into the basement room, and went up to the horse and patted his neck.

"What's he called?" asked Raman, gazing at the horse with admiration.

"I don't know yet," answered Jack and added quickly: "At least I do, but his name's a secret. He only allows me to call him by it."

This was not quite true, as Jack hadn't yet invented a name for him, but he knew that he would sometime.

"He's wonderful," breathed Raman. "Can I have a ride?"

"Well, he doesn't like strangers much," answered Jack. "I'll ride him first so that he can look at you and get used to you."
